Proton-coupled electron transfer from cryptochrome to flavin in purple bacteria. An enzyme-kinetics approach. The mechanism of the light-dependent proton-coupled electron transfer from the two-electron acceptor flavin semiquinone to methyl viologen was investigated using the proton gradient-dependent reduction of riboflavin semiquinone in Escherichia coli and Rhodospseudomonas sphaeroides. The reaction in R. sphaeroides is purely enzymatic, as can be inferred from the high rates of the reduction and the reaction in the dark and its dependence on the membrane potential. The reaction is highly cooperative (cooperativity parameter $n = 2$), indicating that two flavins are oxidized and two protons are translocated. A mechanism for the bacterial reaction is presented, which involves a single charge transfer from the flavin semiquinone to the divalent methyl viologen with rate constant k_0 . The rate of the enzymatic reaction is very small compared to the rate of the photocycle, which is consistent with the idea that the transfer from the photocycle to the enzymatic reaction in R. sphaeroides takes place through a complex and slow process. The rate constant of the enzymatic reaction is accelerated when NADP is the electron acceptor in addition to the two methyl viologen electrons. The enzymatic reaction, which does not take place in E. coli, thus appears to be a general phenomenon in purple bacteria, at least for the reaction with NADP. The apparent $K(m)$ for oxidizing riboflavin semiquinone was determined to be 2.5 μM in R. sphaeroides and 6.5 μM in E. coli. The enzymatic reaction can be explained by assuming that one of the two protons translocated during the photocycle from the cytoplasm to the periplasm is transferred to the catalytic site of the enzyme, where it is released during a catalytic cycle.
